Tango Gelato is closing, too

They've been scooping up frozen treats at 2015 Fillmore for ages, first as Rory's Twisted Scoop, and for the last decade as Tango Gelato, a destination for true Argentinian gelato, sorbetto and for a while - Sunday afternoon tango lessons. The store will close in a few weeks and be replaced by a Vietnamese sandwich shop.

Fillmore Hardware Is Calling It Quits

NE OF Fillmore Street's iconic institutions will disappear by the end of the year when Fillmore Hardware closes its doors promptly at 5:55 for the final time.

"Simply put, we are tired," owners and sisters Patti Lack and Terri Alonzo write in a letter to their customers and neighbors, which is published on page 3.

For 49 years — since 1961 — the store has been the ultimate neighborhood-serving business. Originally twice its present size, it was a full-service hardware and glass company that furnished the materials used to renovate many of the Victorians in the neighborhood. In recent years it became a more eclectic emporium, keeping the basics but focusing more on housewares and remained actively involved in the business until his death last year at age 89.

"We never could have closed while he was alive," Patti Lack said. "It kept him going."

She said they will gradually sell off the store's considerable inventory in the coming weeks and hope to be out by December 31. They own the building and have retained a broker to offer it for lease. She said they had not considered selling the store, which was started by their grandfather.

"Nobody wants to buy a hardware store," she said. "The only reason we've lasted is because we own the building."

Lack said it was an especially difficult decision given the number of people who come in regularly and tell them it's their favorite store.

"It's just time," she said. "But we're gonna totally

Dominique Delanghe on his final day with one last croquembouche

Au Revoir Delanghe, Hello Bakeshop

HE NEWS came as a sudden shock: September 30 was the final day of business for Delanghe Patisserie at the corner of Fillmore and Bush. After 26 years of buttery croissants and mini eclairs, finis.

It seemed impossible to the Francophiles who loved the place and the locals for whom it was always there. No notice! Not even a chance to say goodbye!

On October 1 the keys went to Elena Basegio and her dad, Doug Basegio. Work commenced with a fury. On October 21, the Fillmore Bakeshop opened. At first, the reaction was wary.

"People were coming in saying, basically, "So where are they?" as if we'd taken over their place and buried them out back," said Elena Basegio

The father-daughter team of Swiss bakers approached Dominique Delanghe last spring. Talks were start-andstop. They weren't sure until early September he was actually retiring and the deal was going through.

"There was a lot of trepidation among the customers during the remodeling,' she said. "As much as people were mourning for Delanghe, things began to change when we opened and people saw we mean it. We're the real thing,

After only a few days in welcomed by the neighbor-

Elena and dad Doug Basegio opened the Fillmore Bakeshop just in time to pay tribute to the Glants in pastry: a white chiffon cake filled with chocolate business, they're now being mousse and covered in chocolate ganach hood. "It feels so good," Elena Basegio says, "to be in such a big city and have it feel like such a small town. I'm surprised no one's brought us a casserole yet."

She lives only a few blocks down Bush Street from the bakery — a good thing, since she gets up long before sunrise to start baking, just as Delanghe did.

"I don't think he realized how much people loved this place," said Doug Basegio. But he learned. At a neighborhood dinner party a few days after they closed Dominique and Marie-Jeanne Delanghe acknowledged how touched they were by the outpouring of affection when the neighbors learned they were retiring. Before leaving for their second home on the Ile St. Louis in Paris, Dominique left a note:

"During the last few days of Patisserie Delanghe it was difficult to be cynical and tough due to the overwhelming response from all of you. Thank you San Francisco and each of you for 26 years of support."

NEIGHBORHOOD NEWS

Candidates Square Off in District 2

District 2 on the Board of Supervisors moved up the hill from the Marina October 25 to a lively neighborhood forum sponsored by the Pacific Heights Residents Association.

It ended in something of a draw, with all four candidates — attorney Kat Ander-son, financier Mark Farrell, Golden Gate Bridge board vice chair Janet Reilly and assistant U.S. attorney Abraham Simmons agreeing on most issues.

"We have four excellent choices," moderator Daniela Kirshenbaum said at the end of the forum. "Any one of them would be a terrific choice."

Anderson agreed. "This is an incredibly impressive group," she said in her con-cluding remarks. "Everyone here is smart enough to do this job." She urged voters: "Try to see if you can look into our hearts."

But there were fireworks during the debate, especially over campaign spending. Real estate investor Thomas Coates has contributed $100,000 and socialite Dede Wilsey $50,000 to an independent group supporting Mark Farrell and opposing Janet Reilly

"I don't control what other people do," Farrell said to hisses from the audience. "I do wish money didn't play the role it does. But that's reality.

'The Fillmore Stoop'

As part of a city program to create new public spaces, the local design studio Siol has proposed plans for the Fillmore Stoop, which would be built in the two parking spaces in front of Delfina Pizzeria and Zinc Details on California Street. City planners promise permits for 25 new parklets. If chosen, the Fillmore Stoop will be built next year

Anderson slammed Reilly for the large number of brochures and mailings she has distributed, dramatically tossing a fistful

"I'm getting buried in paper and I'm feeling sorry for all those trees," Anderson said. She prompted more hisses from the audience when she suggested that Reilly had "an inferiority complex."

All four candidates agreed that the plan to build a new high-rise home for California Pacific Medical Center on Cathedral Hill is, as Reilly said, "the most crucial issue" in the district.

"You are in danger of losing a lot of resources if this is built out the wrong way," Simmons said of the $2.5 billion project. "A hospital has to be a good thing," said Anderson. "We want to support it. We just need it to be a good neighbor." All four candidates called for reforming and speeding up the city's planning pro cess and said they support efforts to limit chain stores in neighborhood commercial districts and promised to review them on a case-by-case basis. All supported the Target megastore proposed at Geary and Presidio.

And all touted their individual experience, whether in finance, labor law, community activism or government. Reilly vowed: "I promise to spend more time in the neighborhoods than in City Hall."

Talks Continue Over Future of the Clay Theater

THERE'S BEEN no breakthrough yet, but negotiations are continuing between the owner of the Clay The ater and the San Francisco Film Society which hopes to make the theater its home.

In addition, the owner's architect has met with the CEO of Landmark Theatres. the current operator, about renovations that might make the theater attractive to Landmark as a long-term operator.

"We are actively engaged," said architect Charles Kahn. He said it appears that both Landmark and the Film Society prefer a single-screen theater over his proposal to create three smaller theaters, and that owner Balgobind Jaiswal is agreeable.

More contentious is Jaiswal's desire to build four townhouses above the theater and excavate underneath for parking.

"The theater is secondary to their desire to build condos," said Graham Leggett, executive director of the Film Society. "We worry it's not going to be workable for us." Getting permits and building the condos could take years, Leggett said, and require the theater to go dark during construction.

Kahn said the condos are essential to fund the renovation of the theater. He said the owner is "absolutely committed" to finding a way to save the theater.

"It seems problematic at the moment but at least there's a dialogue," Leggett said. "It's a work in progress

Fillmore Hardware Says Goodbye

Dear customers, friends, neighbors and fellow merchants,

Our grandfather, Jack Hayes, started Fillmore Glass on Post Street near Fillmore in the 1940s. The glass shop moved to the top of Bush Street behind Jack's home, where he worked with his son John, Jack built Fillmore Hardware, replacing his parking lot at 1930 and 1932 Fillmore Street. His eldest son, Jim, was a San Francisco police officer who married Mickey and they had 3 daughters, Nancy, Patti and Terri. Mickey ran the hardware store, which opened in 1961. When she died unexpectedly in 1966, Jim retired from the force and asked his son-in-law, Nancy's husband Phil, to help out for a while. Patti and Terri worked at the store at different times over the years, but moved away with families of their own. Patti came back to stay in 1984 and Terri in 1999 and both worked once again at the store.

We had a fire in 1972 and Jim decided to divide the store in two and rent out one half. Phil continued on as manager and Jim was happy to work from home. Years later Jim taught himself the computer and tried to single-handedly bar code the store, which kept him going until he died in March 2009. Phil retired at the end of 2005, but continues to come by once a week to sell his eggs to his Fillmore friends. This now brings us up to the present and the reason for this letter.

Simply put, we are tired. Retail takes its toll on the body and retirement sounds pretty good to the two of us. We considered staying one more year so we could celebrate 50 years in business, but when you have to spend at least a full day in the easy chair getting over the days you just worked and ready for the days to come, it just isn't worth it. We're not the spring chickens we used to be.

We would like to take this opportunity to thank Phil for staying with us almost 40 years and allowing us the freedom to pursue our lives outside the store until we returned home. Thanks to Patti's daughter Katie for 18 years, and bringing the fun and "cute stuff" to our shelves. Thanks to Phil's son Eric for 13 years and taking us out of the dark ages by replacing our old hand-built shelving system with the ones you see today. Thanks to our workers, who seem more like brothers and sons. Nate, our captain and MacGyver — almost 11 years. Ken, our "Irish guy" who never lets us down — 7 years, and Tony, our fix-it guy, almost 5 years. You guys made the days fun and helped us out in more ways than you will know.

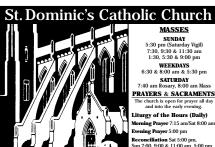

Lastly, a big thank you to our customers, who seem more like friends. Hearing so many of you call us your favorite store made it all worthwhile. Thank you for your support which kept us going for all these years. We will miss this part of our lives but look forward to a little easier life in the not too distant future.

Sincerely

Patti & Terri

UCSF Medical Center

The UCSF Medical Center at Mount Zion is proposing a new parking garage at 2420 Sutter Street near Divisadero that would serve patients, visitors, medical center physicians, and the general public. Currently an empty lot, this site was the home of the San Francisco Center for Psychoanalysis (SFCP) until December

UCSF is negotiating with Urban Pacific Properties to construct a building, which would contain approximately 230 parking spaces. Since our communication with neighbors in June, the project has been revised: it will no longer house SFCP, and is now proposed for parking on one level below ground and six levels above around.

An important part of this planning process is to gather community input on the initial building design concepts and to provide the opportunity for neighbors to ask questions and identify potential areas of concern

Please join us at a UCSF community meeting to discuss this proposed project:

CRIME WATCH

Auto Burelary Webster and Hollis Streets September 23, 7:10 p.m.

Patrol officers responded to a report that someone had broken into a car. The owner of the vehicle returned to his car after a short shopping trip to find his window smashed and his cell phone missing. A witness had observed the incident and called police. The officers stopped a party of juveniles who matched the description. As the officers questioned them, one person dropped a cell phone to the ground. The witness identified the juvenile who had broken into the car: it was the same person who dropped the cell phone. The man who owned the car identified it as his phone. The juvenile was charged with auto burglary and possession of stolen property.

California and Franklin Streets September 24, 1:40 p.m.

An officer was called to Whole Foods to take custody of a shoplifter. A man had entered the store and ordered two pounds of wild fresh shrimp worth about $17 a a retail value of $394.33. The man ther pound. He then moved to the bottled water walked out of the store with security guards aisle, where a security officer observed him placing the seafood into a large bag. The man then left the store without paying. Store security halted him and called the police. He was cited and released.

Franklin and Sutter Streets Sentember 26, 8 n.m.

A man went to Starbucks before it was open and verbally attacked the employees because he was angry that he couldn't get a coffee yet. The argument became so heated that the employees called the police. The man fled but dropped his wallet. Officers responded to the address in the wallet, but the man wasn't home.

Officers knocked on the suspect's door. He screamed at them through the door, giving false information to a police officer. and then threw many heavy objects at it One officer then thought he heard the slide of an automatic weapon. The building was evacuated while the officers attempted to talk the man into coming out. The initial incident occurred at about 7:30 a.m. and did not end until 8 p.m., when SWAT officers forced their way into the suspect's apartment and took him into custody. He was charged with numerous felonies.

California and Franklin Streets October 1, 2:40 p.m.

Officers responded to a report of an assault on a Muni bus. One woman who had been assaulted was riding a crowded bus with her mother when another woman got on and pushed her way to the back of the bus. The suspect then pushed the woman's mother, and insisted that the woman apologize to her. The woman, who did not consider herself at fault, apologized anyway. The suspect then sprayed mace into her face and quickly got off the bus. Officers located the fleeing woman, who was carrying mace in her pocket, and charged her with assault.

Van Ness Avenue and California Street October 2, 1:50 a.m.

Officers were dispatched to the scene of an argument. When they arrived, a man was getting out of a taxi. Officers asked him if and they were no good. Bank employthere was any problem; he said everything

Officers then asked him for identification. He told them he did not have any. But they could clearly see the outline of a wallet in his back pocket. So an officer asked again, pointing to the wallet.

The suspect placed the bag he was carrying on the ground and ran from the officers. They picked up the bag and chased him, capturing him at Franklin and Pacific They searched the man's wallet and backpack and discovered he carried numerous forms of identification — all belonging to other people - along with fraudulen credit cards. In the backpack, officers also found materials to make credit cards, stoler property and methamphetamine. The suspect, who had a warrant for a parole violaon, was charged with numerous felonies.

Felony Theft Webster and O'Farrell Streets October 7, 6:30 p.m.

Officers were called to the Safeway store after security guards saw a person there grab several large handfuls of gum and stuff them into a large black plastic bag. In all, there were 127 packs of gum, which have in his wake. They stopped him, placed him under citizen's arrest and called police. He was charged with burglary, not shoplifting, as he had no means of paying for the gum. Officers learned he had four outstanding warrants for the same offense

Auto Theft Van Ness Avenue and Bush Street October 11, 1:35 a.m.

Officers on patrol observed a car moving recklessly across lanes. They pulled alongside the car and noticed the very youthful appearance of the driver. The vehicle bore a City of Pacifica logo. They stopped the car and asked the driver for his license. He said he didn't have one, then provided Within the hour officers received a call them with a false name After numerous cers asked for his parent's phone number After an additional delay, the 16-year-old driver admitted to the officers that he'd found the keys to the car on the ground next to the vehicle and decided to go for a ride. He was arrested for auto theft and

Felony Assault Eddy Street and Van Ness Avenu

October 17, 10:50 a.m.

A man was riding a Muni bus with two friends. When the bus stopped at Eddy another passenger struck the man in the head from behind. The suspect had hit the man with a golf club, then shouted that he was going to kill him. But before the golf club-wielding man could strike again, the man who had been attacked grabbed the club. The two struggled over control of the golf club until they both fell off of the bus. Meanwhile, several passengers called the police. A nearby San Francisco sheriff deputy responded and took the suspect into custody until Northern Station units arrived. The man who had been struck suffered serious bumps, bruises and cuts. The assailant was placed under arrest.

This time he came in with the type of checks commonly received in the mail from credi card companies. Bank officials called the person whose name appeared on the check. He told them he had torn the checks up ees then asked the suspect to endorse the check. He complied, and was charged with multiple felonies

RETAIL REPORT

10/10/10 brought Fillmore's newest boutique to the street: Los Angeles designer James Perse opened shortly before noon in the long-vacant space at 2028 Fillmore. Shortly after noon, the locals were already streaming in to check out what the company calls its "seamless blend of luxe and casual."

Perse offers clothing for both men and women almost entirely in black, gray and white, plus indoor and outdoor furniture and a few other California essentials including surfboards and beach cruisers. Perse describes his design philosophy as "low maintenance high fashion - emphasizing elegance and comfort, pairing sophistication with simplicity."

It's the designer's second store in San Francisco - he opened near Union Square last fall — and part of a fast-growing group of boutiques in Southern California, Las Vegas, Aspen and New York.

The company brings new life and a minimalist look to a storefront that has sat empty and untended for six years since Departures from the Past, a vintage shop, closed.

Perse, 38, was born and raised in Southern California. He made his first mark on the fashion world as a teenager when he set out to design the perfect baseball cap, which was featured in his father's tony Los Angeles boutique, Maxfield. He followed with ventures into designing T-shirts, casual wear for men and women, children's clothing and, most recently, furniture.

Perse is best known for his basics with what a sales associate calls "ultra-soft cotton tees made of the best cotton he can get his hands on" topping the list. His new Fillmore outpost is well stocked. They line

Helping Local Talent Turn Pro

A new music series ushers performers onto a bigger stage

By Erica Reder

N NOVEMBER 16, drummers from around the Bay Area will perform at the Boom Boom Room for a shot at high-profile recognition.

The event is part of a new monthly music series called Beyond the Music Label. Founder Jewell Sparks aims to help performers get recognition — and paid work. Boom Boom Room owner Alex Andreas donates his club to the cause once a month so that Bay Area artists have a shot at getting their big break on the corner of Fillmore and

Since the first event in August, Beyond the Music Label has featured acts ranging from pop bands to R&B soloists. Each month the focus is on a different genre. In November it's percussion.

Interested artists must submit samples to a selection committee, which includes people from Epic Records, the William Morris Talent Agency and the Jimi Hendrix Foundation. The three top submissions take the stage each month. Performers receive feedback from a team of talent developers, as well as audience members, who are invited to fill out ballots. Sparks says over half the audience has participated each month.

After the show, Beyond the Music Label works to carry out suggestions for improvement, then produces a compilation CD, with proceeds going to the artists and the program's nonprofit partners.

Sparks says she created the series to fill a need in the community. A longtime presence on the San Francisco art scene, she says she has witnessed local musicians' struggles firsthand.

"There's so much talent," she says, "but it's hard for them to make it or get recognized here." Without the entertainment industry of Los Angeles or New York, Bay Area performers have trouble going professional.

"A lot of these people have day jobs," Sparks says, "but if you talk to them, over 50 percent would say they want to do this professionally."

To address this desire, Sparks has assembled a team of industry insiders, media sponsors and nonprofits whose goal is to get local artists "generating revenue by doing what they're passionate about," she says.

The Boom Boom Room's Andreas calls Beyond the Music Label "a great concept for emerging talent." He estimates that between 60 and 100 people have attended each event, with numbers steadily increasing. "I'm always looking to foster new talent," Andreas says.

According to Sparks, Andreas's generosity is rare in the music business. "Many people approached me," she says, "but they wanted to charge," some as much as $5,000 per month.

Free rent isn't the only thing drawing Beyond the Music Label to the Boom Boom Room.

"There's a lot of history here," Sparks says. "It's a perfect location." She says the Fillmore District is "like the New York of San Francisco," citing its diversity and wide appeal. And the neighborhood is "traditionally known as the music district" in the city, she says.

That tradition has already helped attract an audience for the Beyond the Music Label's programs. The first event in August coincided with a Billy Idol concert across the street at the Fillmore Auditorium. People stopped by on their way to hear the English rock star, inspiring Sparks to pursue a more formal neighborhood alliance She hopes to coordinate future events with the Fillmore so people can frequent both venues on the same night.

As Beyond the Music Label gets settled into the community, Sparks is planning the next step. In December, the series will expand to other cities. First on the list is Park City, Utah, to be followed by Portland, Austin and Chicago — all places that share San Francisco's rich talent base and limited business opportunities. Sparks says she hopes the expansion will make more musicians visible nationally — while helping them keep doing what they

A Relationship With Readers

By Ken Samuels | photographs by Kathi o'leary

THE OTHER DAY, while selling some books to a couple of young men, I realized I'd known them since they were little kids pleading with their mothers to buy them Berenstain Bears books.

That sums up my decade and a half at Browser Books on Fillmore and Sacramento selling books to the families of this neighborhood. I get to know them as they return again and again. Some kids are shy, nudging their parents to the counter to ask a question, while others march up and confidently fire away with their requests. Hands down, these are the most rewarding moments of my workday.

I never forget how booksellers shared their enthusiasm for literature with me when I was a child. Along with my family, they made me a lover of books - and in time a writer. I don't know if I'm helping neighborhood kids become writers, but I hope I'm helping them become book and bookstore lovers.

Browser Books, like all independent bookshops, faces many challenges these days, but our relationship with the readers in this neighborhood is what sustains us. It begins with the young ones. One minute they're reading Harold and the Purple Crayon and before you know it they're on to War and Peace. After all these years, I still love to watch this development.

To me, that's the definition of being a local, neighborhood bookseller.

BACK IN THE FILLMORE - Bernard Zakheim's artwork returns to the Fillmore in "The Art of Prophetic Justice," a new exhibition at the Jazz Heritage Center at 1320 Fillmore Street, which continues through the end of the year.

The Provocative Muralist

s much as any rabbi's sermon ✓ Lin Depressionera San Francisco, the life and work of an immigrant Jewish artist vividly reflected the class war on the streets. Bernard Baruch Zakheim, a Yiddishist and a Communist, a portraitist and a muralist, would be at the center of the greatest controversy over public art in the city's history.

Born into a wealthy Hasidic family in Warsaw in 1896, Zakheim was sent to a veshiva but cut class in order to explore the city's colorful neighborhoods. He developed an aversion toward both Judaism and capitalism, dropping out of the yeshiva and later a business school intended to groom him to run the family's enterprises. Instead he gravitated toward painting and, over the objections of his widowed mother, entered the prestigious Warsaw

World War I, however, forced him to postpone his dreams. He fought against the German invaders, was captured and spent nearly a year in a POW camp. After the armistice Zakheim had high hopes for the new Polish republic, but he soon became disillusioned when a right-wing dictatorship took power. Hoping to put the trauma of the war and its aftermath behind him, he and his new bride immigrated to San Francisco, "as far away from Europe as they could possibly go."

They had a daughter in 1921, and economic necessity forced Zakheim to put painting aside and work as a designer and manufacturer of fine furniture. Business was brisk, but, lacking the time or energy for his true passion, he desnaired and sought refuge in alcohol.

An opportunity came in 1929, when

Diego Rivera, to whom Zakheim had sent some sketches, invited him to Mexico City to work as an assistant muralist During his six months there — during which he left his business and child in his wife's care he learned about Mayan and Aztec art and studied wall painting at the feet of a master.

Zakheim returned to San Francisco with a deepened understanding of the relationship between art and ethnicity. Before leaving for Mexico he had been active in the left-leaning Folkschule at the Steiner Street Yiddish cultural center, where he occasionally taught woodcarving, sculpture and painting, and organized Iewish art exhibitions His experience in Mexico confirmed his belief that "an artist's native soil will always impress a certain Like Marc Chagall, who retained his East European sensibility after he immigrated to a mod-

Despite the birth of a second daughter, Zakheim left his family again, this time to study in Paris and travel throughout Europe for a year. Returning in 1932, he discovered that his wife had lost the furniture factory in the Depression, so he scratched out a living as an upholsterer, continued to paint and battled his drinking problem. Finally, a fresh opportunity arrived: He won a competition to create a fresco in the courtyard of the new Jewish Community Center.

Completed in mid-1933, The Jewish Wedding would be one of the most notable works of art in any Jewish building in the American West. The local press lauded the hundred-square-foot representation, indeed celebration, of life in ancient Israel with human figures that seemed to originate in Africa, Europe and the Far East as well as the Holy Land, Zakheim's multicultural vision was also electic in form, combining geometric techniques he had learned in Mexico, modernist styles he had just seen in Paris and, of course, Jewish symbols with which he had grown up in Warsaw. For Joseph Danysh, arguably the city's most influential art critic and dealer, Zakheim had "made his wall come alive" with Jewish "movement" that ranged from religious to recreational activity, creating a work especially befriting a JCC.

After years of struggle and pain, recognition had finally come Zakheim's way. At the gallery he co-owned with Ansel Adams, Danysh scheduled a one-man show of the enchanting watercolors, many of them on Jewish themes, that the artist had painted in Europe.

But that accomplishment was soon dwarfed by the commission to create a huge wall painting, and indeed to conceptualize the entire "mural program" executed by 26 local arrists, for San Francisco's newest public building, Coti Tower. Funded through a bequest seeking to honor San Francisco's firefighters, the tall, cylindrical, flutted landmark, with its dazzling matrine views, was destined to become a popular attraction. The 3,700 square feet of its interior walls — providing more space than all the murals in the state combined — were to carry scenes of everyday life in California.

The offer came from an unexpected source: Herbert Fleishhacker. The conservative banker had not only over-

'The Jewish Wedding'

Bernard Zakheim completed "The Jewish Wedding" in 1933 for the Jewish Community Center at California Street and Presidio Avenue. In 2001, as the JCC planned to raze its outmoded building and replace it with a new facility at the same site, it appeared the mural would be demolished. Only a last-minute plea from Zakheim's family saved it. The wall containing the mural was removed, restored and in 2004 trumphantly installed in the new building, Ironically, the project to save the mural was supported by the Fleishhacker family, whose patriarch had been Zakheim's nemesis during the battle over the Colt Tower murals. (Above, a study for the JCC mural.)

seen construction of the tower as president of the Park and Art Commission, but he was also the most powerful member of a committee recently formed to allocate federal funds to arts projects on behalf of the New Deal's WPA. He invited Zakheim to his mansion, and the Communist noted the "exquisite wines" and "wonderful goodies" that "this Fleishhacker" served in the depths of the Depression.

Fleishhacker was likely familiar with the political sympathies of Zahleim, now active in the left-wing Artists and Writers' Union and the John Reed Club, both organized by his close friend, Kenneth Rexroth, the city's best-known bohemian poet. But Fleishhacker, who had staked his reputation on the oddly shaped tower, which was opposed by many neighborhood residents, felt that a lively, engaging decoration of the interior might quiet the critics.

Presiding over the largest federally funded arts project in the country, Fleishhacker sought to retain artistic control over the murals. He knew that the compensation of a dollar an hour would mean a great deal to the painters during the Depression, to say nothing of the publicity they would gain. Predictably, however, Zakheim would come to resent his patrons' interference, dubbing the tower "Fleishhacker's last erection." The tycoon, mean-while, would demand that a good number of the murals be removed.

The battle over the frescoes of Telegraph Hill might never have occurred had it not been for events on the waterfront below. In the late spring of 1934, while the artists worked in Coit Tower, the city was torn apart by its largest and most violent labor dispute ever. As one art historian has said, the muralists "had clear sight lines [to] the bloody hand-to-hand battles between strikers, scabs, the National Gourd and the city police."

Accordingly, class struggle was a major theme of the CoitTower artists, and Zakheim's own mural, innocuously titled Library, was one of the clearest examples. Near the center of the composition sat the artist himself, intently studying the Bible in Hebrew. But his reading room also included a well-known local Communist reaching for Dan Kapital. Perhaps most striking was a welter of people perusing newspapers, including the Western Worker (the Pacific Coast edition of the Daily Worker), with inflammatory headlines mitroring the current crisis of American capitalism. One with grave portents announced the recent destruction of Riversis murtal in New York City's Rockefeller Center, his patron, Nelson Rockefeller, had objected to a portrait of Lenin, which the Mexican would not expunge.

In the combative context of July 1934, the Coit Tower murals led to a "grudge" match, as one journalist wrote, "between Kid Capital and Kayo Communism."Three artists in particular, John Langley Howard, Clifford Wight and Zakheim, all members of the Communist Party, were singled out in the press for having "indulged in a little Communist propaganda, and at the expense of the U.S. government."

In an effort that resembled their bumbling response to Emma Goldman's visit two decades earlier, the police raided artists' studios, searching in vain for explosives behind canvases and sculptures. But the height of Red-baiting occurred on July 5 (coincidentally "Bloody Thursday," the day police shot dead two strikers on the docks), when the Examiner published a reproduction of Zakheimis Library. Across the top of the picture the Hearst paper superimposed a hammer and sickle, encircled by the slogan "Workers of the World Unite," an icon the artist never used. The headline read "Soviet Symbol in Tower," and the caption below declared "Here is the painting in the Coit Memorial Tower that has caused a bitter discure."

The doctored photo dampened enthusiasm for Zakheim's exhibition at the Adams-Danysh Gallery — many shunned the painter they now believed to be a hard-line Stalinist — and further inflamed the Coit Tower imbroglio. In reality, Zakheim, like his mentor Rivera and companion Rexroth, frequently strayed from the party line, and the American Communist Party leaders considered all three renegades. But this fact was lost on the press, the art critics and, of course, Herbert Fleishhacker.

Fleishhacker used his influence to padlock the tower in early June — its public opening had been scheduled for July 7 — and to keep it closed until October, when tensions finally eased after the waterfront strike ended. The Artist's and Writers Union picketed against the closure, but their actions had no effect on the "Fleishhacker group," for whom some of the wall paintings were "wholly unacceptable and . . . dangerous." In the end, however, the murals remained almost entirely intact and may be viewed today nearly exactly as painted. (Wight's mural did in fact include a hammer and sickle, and he reluctantly agreed to remove it.)

Despite his sullied reputation, Zakheim would be commissioned for other monumental frescoes, including The Story of California Medicine, in the amphitheater of Toland Hall on the UC medical school campus in San Francisco. Finished toward the end of the 1930s, the ambitious 12-panel painting reflects the influence on Zakheim of another leftist Mexican muralist, Jose Clemente Orozco, and delivers a Marxist message about the exploitation of indigenous peoples.

But this prolectarian art caused none of the turmoil generated by the Coit Tower murals. By the late 1930s left-wing artists and intellectuals in the city were internally divided ideologically and, most important, had lost heir fleeting link to the working class. The stablishment no longer perceived Zakheim and other radical artists as the mortal threat to society that they had seemed in 1934. That year, punctuated by violence on the waterfront, stands alone in San Francisco history as the apogee of class conflict.

The Hula Hoop Is Back

They're hooping at a historic dance studio on Divisadero

ATE ON A recent Wednesday night, all was quiet on the corner of Divisadero and Bush except for the slow buzz of traffic.

But just above the street in a nearby studio, a group of eight local women were sweating it out, gyrating with giant plastic hoops as electro-swing music pulsed the beat. Hooping is a revived fitness trend, and HoopGirl holds regular classes right in the neighborhood.

hooping from the 1950s. It's a dancelike routine that includes tricks and real showmanship. Think LED hoops and jam circles ance and assertiveness in my students, in which participants throw hoops in the air and spin them everywhere from their chests to their knees. Moves have names such as Booty Bump, Warrior With Leap artistic purposes and tie it to something and Wild West. There's even an unofficial uniform of stretchy flare leg pants or short shorts and brightly colored cropped tops.

Beginning hoopers laugh and chatter as their hoops repeatedly crash to the floor; the more experienced hoop for hours, moving in time to music in a meditative trance.

Christabel Zamor is one of the founders of the hoopdance movement, which has iam band music roots and evolved at Burning Man and other countercultural

Enamored with hooping, Zamor started her company, HoopGirl, in 2001. She now offers beginning and intermediate hooping classes, hula hooping performances and a teacher-training program at studios in Mill Valley and San Francisco, including at Dance Ground Keriac on Divisadero Street near Bush.

Zamor credits hooping with transforming her from a shy, overweight academic to an outgoing and fit hooping superstar. In her book, Hooping: A Revolutionary Fitness Program, she explains that hooping is a way to connect with the body, gain fitness, release tension and build confidence. She This is not plain old backyard hula started HoopGirl to share these benefits

Julie Greicius leads the beginning HoopGirl workout series along with Cassandra Giovagnoli on Divisadero.

"It's addictive," she says. "When you see someone surfing, so joyful and focused well, hooping's like that."

Greicius finds it so much fun that she regularly hoops for three hours. A trim 30-mile-a-week runner, she still feels challenged by the activity. "My heart rate and breathing go up, and my arms and legs are working," she says. "But you don't really notice that you're exercising."

Hooping may also have other health benefits. In her book, Zamor cites doctors and former students who have found in hooping a salve for conditions ranging from obesity to endometriosis. One hooping enthusiast says the exercise helped her recover from the back pain caused by a serious car accident. For some, the motion of a hoop rubbing sore muscles can serve as a sort of massage, easing pain and tension.

The HoopGirl Workout series consists of six 90-minute sessions. Classes are held in Dance Ground Keriac's studio with its high ceilings - the better for tossing hoops up in the air. One Wednesday night student admitted that her apartment ceiling now has scuffmarks - battle scars from her at-home practice.

A mix of homey and historical, the Dance Ground Keriac studio is an ideal spot for the class. The mirrored, woodfloored room resembles a smaller version of a school gymnasium, but has also been home to decades worth of dance classes and aerial dance performances. Several dance companies have rehearsed or performed on the same scuffed floor. Formerly the home of renowned dance and performance teacher Keriac, it's currently home to Scott Wells & Dancers' "contact improvisation" classes and workshops.

"I'm devoted to that studio," says Greicius. "I love the high ceilings and playful decorations - and knowing that circus performers and other amazing artists and dancers practice there regularly. It's a good Greicius's students have ranged in age from 15 to 70. Most are women, but mer participate as well.

The HoopGirl program attributes its hooping success to heavier, adult-size hoops and the "pumping" method. Basically, instead of moving hips from side to side, the hooper moves the hips from front to back. Greicius compares the movement to skating and snowboarding.

To the students, hooping is a way to stay fit that is fun, too, "It's a fun workout," says Wednesday night attendee Kat Dallons. "Every other exercise I've tried gets boring. This is a physical activity that I actually

Students share smiles and laughs, and despite being strangers before the series began, students graduating from a recent series ended it with hooping camaraderie. Compliments about hooping clothes and moves abounded.

The class formed a tight dance circle several times during the hour and a half. All students had the chance to go into the center and show off the moves they'd mastered while the rest of the class egged them on and did the basic pump. Cheers were iust as loud for hoops that fell and students who chose not to enter the center of the circle as for those who had mastered the

By the end of the class, the students seemed hardly to notice that they had been exercising nonstop for over an hour. Many had purchased their own hoops and discussed plans to hoop in city parks.

As for Greicius, she is looking forward to the next group of potential hoopers. "This class is my weekly getaway, even as the teacher," she says. "It's my recess."

Hoot Girl's classes are held at Dance Ground Keriac, 1805 Divisadero. The series is $180. Drop-in for one class is $35 and there is a one-hour drop-in session in which hoopers at all levels can practice and get pointers. Go to hoopgirl.com for details.

Sales slow, but there's activity at the high end

Neighborhood home sales declined significantly during the last month. Single family home sales dropped 42 percent, while condo sales dropped 59 percent. Still, there have been several significant new sales and listings at the high end of the market.

Among the homes that sold last month, 3085 Pacific stood out as a unique mid-century offering on a prime block. Designed by architect Joseph Esherick the home features a Zen balance of indoor-outdoor space, with a lush landscaped courtyard and large windows overlooking the deck and garden. Buyers responded quickly and the home sold in just 13 days. Also in Pacific Heights, two beautifully renovated Victorians sold — one an off-market sale at 2542 Fillmore Street: and 2446 Washington which was scooped up by San Francisco architect Bill Cahan. And at 2006 Washington Stree — the classic salmon pink 1924 co-op building designed by C.A. Meussdorffer (above) — the full-floor apartmen 4, with sweeping views of the Golden Gate Bridge, Alcatraz and Lafayette Park, finally sold after almost a year on the market.

NEW LISTINGS: The 2006 Decorator Showcase home at 3701 Washington Street came on the market this month at an asking price of almost $13.5 million. This grand Presidio Heights 1902 Beaux Arts mansion is perched on an elevated corner lot and features 7 bedrooms, 6.5 baths, walk-out terraces, gardens and a guest house. In Pacific Heights, the Gold Coast corner mansion at 2701 Broadway also came on the market this month, for $32 million, Restored in 2002, it includes three rooftop terraces, a basketball court and a commercial speed elevator to all

New condo offerings include a 1-bedroom, 1-bath unit in the newer 1805 Fillmore Street building, built in 1986, for $469,000. Walkscore.com — which rates property for the "walkability" of its location — gives this 610 sq. ft. condo a score of 100 out of 100 for its proximity to all the Fillmore corridor has to offer. At the other end of the spectrum, the full-floor 5,224 sq. ft. co-op apartment 6 at 2000 Washington Street hit the market for $12.5 million.

n one of the more unusual examples of architectural ornament in San Francisco. a circle of ladybugs surrounds what appears to be a 1915 Ford Model-T Roadster. They adorn the facade of the architecturally significant 94-year-old garage that is home to Hayes Auto Repair at 2401 Bush Street, between Pierce and Scott. Perhaps it was just a whimsi cal detail added by the architect, James R. Miller, or his favorite draftsman, then-24-year-old Timothy L. Pflueger.

Miller & Pflueger would become wellknown in the 1920s and 1930s for projects such as the city's first high-rise at 140 New Montgomery, the Stock Exchange building and club, the medical building at 450 Sutter the Castro and Paramount Theaters and other major buildings, many in what is now referred to as the Art Deco style.

But before these high profile projects, where Pflueger would make a name for himself as a master of the style. Miller was building their architectural practice. Residential and commercial work came into the office consistently after the 1906 earthquake, and Miller and his crew, including the young Pflueger, a San Francisco native who grew up in the Mission District, were busy.

The garage at 2401 Bush Street is an example of Miller's eclectic take on the Renaissance revival style, which he and his chief draftsman Pflueger would use again in the Redwood City Firehouse — now the Redwood City Public Library — three years later. Like the firehouse, the Bush Street garage is faced in brick and highlighted by

The garage is characterized by an unusual broken-pitch roof and three arched entrances, two for vehicles and one for the office. Mullioned windows add a French twist to the Italianate arches. In 1901, Pardon A. Cook, who owned a large swath of real estate in the neighborhood, hired a contractor to build a one-story building with an attic on the Bush Street lot. But he suffered "a stroke of apoplexy" on March 15, 1901, which rendered him mentally incompetent. When he died later that year, his wife Lizzie J. Cook inherited about $15,000 in cash and property all over the Western Addition valued at more than

$120,000, according to a probate listing in the San Francisco Chroni

Two of his three daughters, Inez Cook Noble and Alice Cook Swan, ultimately inherited the property from their mother. In December 1915, they filed a permit seeking to build a brick store and garage, with Miller as the architect, for $14,700.

It appears that the sisters quickly found a tenant — two brothers who operated a garage just across the street from the Cook family home at 2212 Sutter Street. The brothers. Edward and Charles Fisher, were both in their early 40s and had moved to Sar Francisco from Marin County. Inez and her husband, Paul Noble, a physician, lived on the same block at 2298 Sutter Street

The Nobles must have been pleased with the work of Miller and his protege, because they hired the two again in 1916 to design a small bungalow in Los Altos.

By June of 1917, the two brothers were operating their garage, known as the Fisher Brothers, at 2407 Bush Street, one of several addresses used through the years for this expansive building, according to city directories.

The firm also began selling Ford automobiles at the same address, becoming one of 12 Ford dealers around the city. Most of the big auto showrooms congregated on Van Ness Avenue, also known as Auto Row where Miller & Pflueger were among many local architects to design elegant selling rooms in the 1920s.

The car business continued to boom in the '20s, along with the economy and the stock market. By 1925, another partner William B. Teall, joined Fisher Brothers The dealership changed its name to Fisher Teall Motor Co. and moved to 1955 Post Street. Another garage operator took over the Bush Street space.

Today, the building is owned by Alan Yukawa, whose father bought it 41 years ago. Yukawa said he believed AT&T had occupied the site at one point, and also a plumbing supply company. His family turned it back into an auto repair shop.

As for the ladybugs that grace the front of the building, they remain a mystery
